Abstract

This study investigates multidisciplinary innovation in the teaching of scientific writing, focusing on the development of a theoretical framework and its experimental validation. The framework integrates logical thinking, creativity, and adaptability to enhance scientific writing skills and communication competencies. The experiment involved a four-semester university program guiding students from creative writing to complex scientific article production within diverse multidisciplinary contexts. The proposed methodology is also applicable in research institutions, corporate training programs, and other roles requiring proficiency in multidisciplinary scientific writing.

The findings demonstrate that the framework significantly improved students' reasoning, structured thinking, and innovation capabilities, enabling them to present novel ideas effectively in academic settings. A key outcome of the program was the advancement of metacognitive awareness, supported by AI tools, allowing students to critically evaluate and refine their work. Additionally, the study highlighted the role of AI in enhancing the structural and stylistic quality of scientific writing while addressing ethical considerations.

The sequential design of the methodology and the multidisciplinary environment fostered knowledge exchange among students from various disciplines, preserving the unique attributes of each field. The five-step analysis framework, used to compare the outcomes of experimental and control groups, revealed statistically significant advantages for students participating in the methodological program. This research underscores the importance of multidisciplinary approaches for advancing 21st-century scientific literacy and emphasizes the global adaptability of such innovative programs.

Keywords: scientific writing, multidisciplinary education, logical thinking, creativity, adaptability, AI tools, metacognition, experimental validation.
