from Arrows of Desire Essays on Our National Character and Outlook This is a series of somewhat disconnected essays and like many other recent publications it owes its origin to the war It has not been easy for anyone in these last few years to give his mind to purely speculative inquiries Absorbing as the problems of the cosmos must be to all who have ever felt their fascination devotion to them presupposes some degree of stability in the affairs of the little planet that we inhabit When the whole order of our civilization was threatened even those who were most completely destitute of any power to set against the forces that made for dissolution were at least bound to feel a certain call to contribute something to the great work of re establishing a better and more enduring order Those who could do little or nothing of a directly practical kind towards the furtherance of this end were naturally led to attempt at least to help in the interpretation of the conditions in which we are placed and in the consideration of possible means for their improvement It is out of such an endeavour that these essays have grown They are specially concerned with our own national life and character the subject that seemed most readily accessible and not perhaps the least important Some aspects of it no doubt are not specially within the writer s province To treat them satisfactorily there would have been needed a more intimate knowledge of history and literature of anthropology and social conditions than I have found myself able to acquire About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of
