DNA Damage Susan S. Wallace, Bennett van Houten, Yoke Wah Kow, 1994 The focus of this collection of papers is upon the perturbations which damage introduces into DNA molecules and how these structural changes influence the recognition and interactions of biologically important proteins with damaged DNA Cumulated Index Medicus, 1994 Research Awards Index, 1988 Methods for Assessing the Effects of Chemicals on Reproductive Functions Velimir B. Ornstein, 1997 Cambridge Scientific Biochemistry Abstracts, 1992-10 Impact of DNA Structure and Aeropyrum Pernix Single-strand DNA Binding Protein on Oxidative Damage to DNA Nicholas J. Amato, 2013 DNA replication is essential to life To successfully replicate DNA and preserve the genomic code many replication proteins are coordinated to facilitate the generation of the daughter strands 1 Unfortunately the fidelity of DNA replication can be compromised by DNA damage resulting from assault by reactive oxygen species ROS It has been shown that elevated levels of ROS during DNA replication result in a prolonged S phase and if left unrepaired can lead to apoptosis 2 Despite the prevalence of DNA repair pathways DNA damage during replication exists as a significant source of genomic instability 3 Such DNA damaging events lead to the onset of many diseases and illnesses such as cancer 4 Specifically the participation of single stranded DNA binding proteins SSBs in DNA replication and repair processes are essential to maintaining genomic integrity 5 Currently the role of SSBs is well documented but their functions have not been fully elucidated One particular role of SSBs that remains highly conjectured is their ability to protect regions of ssDNA from DNA damage When the SSBs associate with DNA the sugar phosphate backbone remains solvent exposed being accessible to DNA damaging agents such as ROS Thus we hypothesize that the 2 deoxyribose moiety of DNA in the SSB DNA complex is susceptible to hydrogen atom abstraction of which the DNA damage products are anticipated to be influenced by the presence of the SSB In order to elucidate the impact of protein binding on DNA damage a complete understanding of DNA damage in the absence of proteins must be first assessed This research project establishes an in vitro model system for determining the interplay of DNA protein binding on C3 oxidative DNA damage A C3 radical precursor was synthesized and incorporated into DNA using automated DNA synthesis Selective C3 radical generation was achieved in DNA replication relevant architectures to evaluate the impact of DNA structure and sequence on the fate of the C3 oxidative damage products The resulting damage products were quantified using tandem IEX RP HPLC and identified using MALDI TOF MS Next the thermodynamic and structural effects of the DNA damage lesions generated were characterized using circular dichroism differential scanning calorimetry and UV melting temperature analysis Finally the impact of the oxidative DNA damage lesions on SSB DNA complex formation were evaluated by fluorescence anisotropy Together these results provide the foundation required for determining the impact of SSBs and other
