

Animals in War

First World War 1914-1918

Second World War 1939-1945

Animals played a vital role in both the First and Second World Wars. Not only did they bear the burden of the soldiers fighting, but they supported transportation and communication too.

Horses
First World War

Before the First World War, material transport was limited and wars were fought by armies. The muddy conditions of trench warfare on the Western Front, as well as the use of new weapons, like the machine gun, made fighting on horseback increasingly difficult. Instead, millions of horses were used to help transport soldiers, supplies and munitions to and from the frontline. Because of their strength, some horses were employed to pull heavy artillery guns.

Pigeons
First World War

Over 100,000 pigeons were used to aid communication. For pigeons were trained to carry messages over long distances and were carried across back to Britain from the frontline. They were very reliable and could more easily navigate the dangers of the battlefields than people. They were so important that harming a pigeon could result in imprisonment!

Horses
Second World War

By the start of the Second World War, new technology meant that horses were used less than in the First World War. However, horse-drawn gun carriages and cannons were still a familiar sight on the battlefields. Horses continued to help transport weapons, ammunition and medical supplies across rough terrain when it was unavailable for motorised transport.

Pigeons
Second World War

Pigeons continued to play an essential role during the Second World War, with around 200,000 used to carry messages. These were carried in small containers attached to their legs or in soft pouches wrapped around their bodies.

Dogs
Second World War

Dogs performed similar duties in the Second World War. On the home front, dogs helped locate survivors who were trapped beneath rubble following German air raids.

Interesting facts

- The Animals in War Memorial is a large, stone and bronze monument on the edge of Hyde Park in London. It was built as a tribute to the million millions of animals made during the wars of the 20th century.
- Many other animals played important roles during both wars. These include cats, canaries, mules and donkeys.
- The Duke Medal was introduced in 1941. It was awarded to any animal that showed outstanding bravery or devotion to duty.
