

The drawing belongs to a series of five sheets made during the French Virgin of the New Testament period, executed around 1545-17. The religious subject-matter is combined with a real costume study and the artist to lend the picture greater authority. The attractive and richly attired woman moves elegantly forward through the picture space, gathering up the raised folds of her skirt with her left hand. There is a suggestion of the "S" curve of Gothic figures of around 1400, which is now translated, however, into the formal language of the Renaissance. Thus, the full draperies are not allowed to submerge the woman's figure. The free, sketch-like mode of drawing, with constant alterations, and the use of the charcoal or wax stick, the favoured medium for working drawings, indicate that the series of sheets of the "French Virgin" were made as preliminary studies of design.
