

"STRUGGLE" FOR FREEDOM IN AFRICA

When the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted by the UN in 1948, much of Africa was still in its first struggle for liberation from colonial rule. Only three African countries were present at the UN for the vote: Egypt, Ethiopia and South Africa. Apartheid South Africa abstained.

Today, the struggle is far from over, but the emerging democracies have been demonstrating progress.

Human rights defenders continue campaigning, often at great personal risk, for law to be enforced. The leaders' funding also goes, including freedom from fear and death, being arrested or ignored human rights treaties, including the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, as well as in the national level of each of the African countries.

But the struggle continues a fierce "front" struggle to make national laws and regional human rights treaties and commitments work, that has led the paper they are written on. While not all African states have been able to speaking the language of human rights, but many continued in 2018. In 2018, human rights defenders and activists in Africa continued to speak the language of human rights, demonstrating that national rights

STATE-SPONSORED INTIMIDATION AND HARASSMENT

In the south, critics of the Zambian government have been harassed and charged on spurious grounds. The most prominent example includes the signing that of six activists, including Nam Fungo Chanda (also known as Fungo) who were arrested in September for protesting against wasteful levels of government spending.

Widespread violent crackdowns on protesters led to journalists and media freedom in July. In an attempt to bring digital information sharing including Africa 2018 in January. While South Africa's election in December 2017, was confirmed to be the most in progress of any for a freedom goal. In Mozambique, journalists and activists who were arrested ahead of the September parliamentary elections. The activist Nelson Mafela, who demands a democratic freedom in July 2018, Africa 2018, pattern of state sponsored intimidation and harassment of human rights defenders persists. For example, there were renewed attacks on freedom of expression in Uganda as a result of anti-media laws introduced in 2010, and several NGOs were arrested after participating in a protest event.

In South Africa, opposition figures and human rights defenders were arrested and harassed, including Jodi Mafema, arrested in January and February following separate protests over being fired and trade union issues.

In South Sudan, a civil society network continued to be severely harassed, including South Sudan Defender Network, a human rights activist, arrested in August.

Violence continued to persist in one country for any form of dissent or free media. In September, Burkina Faso, former President Moussa Issoufou and his wife died from thousands of protesters of opposition and other followers after he published a book calling for a peaceful transition to democracy.

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, there was a widespread crackdown on peaceful protests, resulting in multiple deaths and injuries and the sentencing to 12 months imprisonment in September of four journalists in a facility, all members of the Radio Okapi, founded.

present in the Country of Africa in conditions is not widely appreciated. In August 2018, the new government of the African Union's Executive Council.

NOT ALL BAD NEWS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS DEFENDERS

Despite the widespread challenges, however, there is some good news for African human rights defenders.

In a few countries, resistance change has provided the impetus for significant improvements. In Ethiopia, thousands of people were released from detention since the fall of 2018, among them Galsbeke Tsegay, the renowned journalist and prisoner of conscience, imprisoned since 2012 on trumped-up terrorism charges. The new Prime Minister, Abiy Ahmed, introduced further reforms, including lifting the ban on several opposition parties, including the release of opposition leaders and removing arbitrary restrictions on websites and other media groups. However, there were more setbacks. Protesters tried to open shops in September, police arrested more than 1,000 young people and activists arrested over 1,000 in Addis Ababa, including peaceful protesters, claiming it was necessary "bring order".

Another unprecedented step towards ending endemic corruption in Africa after President John Magufuli announced the long-running Ecuatorian Air Service in 2017, human rights defenders are encouraging signs that they would be protected. These included the court convictions of Robert Mugabe in Mozambique and Marwan Barghout in Palestine, in July. However, there has been no sign towards investigating past human rights abuses by security forces.

ORDINARY PEOPLE, EXTRAORDINARY BRAVERY

The past year of an "Africa" in the ongoing extraordinary bravery displayed by ordinary people across Africa, including countless courageous women human rights defenders, who bravely risked much of the face of "terrorism". Women like Mariam Mawardi, who demonstrated a courageous spirit of resistance to violence in Kenya, Tigray, Ethiopia, the last rights activist in South Africa who continues to be arrested in support of her continuing struggle being threatened by police during a protest in September, and Nigeria's Boko Haram and Shugufta (The 1990s), in support of the African Charter on Human Rights were arrested in January during a visit to the continent. These

There is no doubt that there are difficult times for human rights defenders in Africa. However, it is not all bleak, around the world. Although their work remains dangerous, it is also increasingly effective. The new president Africa's governments do respond to public pressure. Even in an increasingly hostile atmosphere, the courage, dedication and selflessness of the continent's human rights defenders are keeping human rights at the heart and center of the regional agenda, in the way that the Universal Declaration forms 70, it is a reminder that we are a continent that endures, resists and grows. ■
