How Coca-Cola and Starbucks Pushed the Boundaries of U.S. and China Relations

Introduction

In 2000, celebrating the passage of the China Trade Bill, President Bill Clinton said: “By joining the WTO, China is not simply agreeing to import more of our products: it is agreeing to import one of democracy’s most cherished values: economic freedom”.¹

This paper aims to investigate how and to what extent this occurred, focusing on the development of US-China relations as seen through the activities of two iconic American companies: Coca-Cola, which returned to China in 1978 on the eve of the restoration of US-China relations, and Starbucks, which opened the doors of its Beijing store in 1999 just before another significant milestone in China’s global economic integration — the country’s entry into the World Trade Organization in 2001.

Although President Clinton’s expectations have not been fully realized, the spread of consumer culture, driven by American companies, has deeply influenced the Chinese market. These companies have been aggressive in expanding their reach, inspired by Milton Friedman’s well-known but often debated principle that a corporation’s primary responsibility is to its shareholders, emphasizing profits over broader social and ethical concerns. This approach, which has recently sparked a debate about whether focusing on profit might conflict with the ethical duty to advance society, might also lead to a reconsideration of the role international firms played in China’s reforms.

Friedman made his first visit to China in 1980, at a crucial time when the country was beginning its deep economic reforms under Deng Xiaoping. During this visit, Friedman engaged with Chinese economists and policymakers, advocating for economic liberalization as a pathway to prosperity and stability². Friedman’s doctrine posited that the expansion of free markets would inherently lead to individual freedoms and democratic practices, a view that aligned with the prevailing scholarly thought of the era which suggested that global engagement would naturally lead to democratization and liberalization³. However, the translation of these economic reforms into political change has

³ Many scholars in the domains of foreign and economic policy have expressed this idea. Among them, it is worth mentioning Thomas Friedman and his “Golden Arches Theory of Conflict Prevention,” which posits that “no two countries that both had McDonald’s have fought a war against each other since each got its McDonald’s.”
