The lightning is the fast discharge of electricity from the clouds to the ground. When lightning strikes the water from the negatively charged clouds to the positively charged water, it causes a massive discharge of electricity. This is why lightning strikes the sea and kills fish.

Lightning

What Causes Lightning?

Lightning is caused by the buildup of static electricity within a cloud. The positive and negative charges separate, and the positive charge (protons) stays at the top, and the negative charge (electrons) stays at the bottom of the cloud.

If positive things build up at the ground beneath the cloud, attracted to the negative things at the bottom of the cloud. The ground, positive things, sometimes cause lightning that strikes up. This, sometimes, will happen, especially on wet ground. The positive things, moving up from the ground, connects with the negative things, starting them from the clouds, and a spark of lightning starts.
